TRADE MARKS, TRADE NAMES OR BRANDS

This is a list of trade marks or brand names used in Canada showing type of products and names of Canadian manufacturers using them. We believe this list to be as comprehensive as any such list published in Canada. We have made every effort to be accurate. However, we are relying on the good faith of the companies that have voluntarily submitted the information and we are not in a position to verify the accuracy of these submissions. The trade marks listed are not necessarily registered in the Trade Marks Office under the Trade Marks Act. In cases where two or more companies are listed as using the same trade mark for similar products, we will delete a duplicate trade mark whenever the exclusive owner provides us with legal proof of his exclusive ownership. Under no circumstances can legal responsibility be assumed by the Canadian Trade Index and/or The Canadian Manufacturers' Association for any errors, omissions or duplications in these listings.

What is a Trade Mark?

It's a mark used to distinguish the wares or services sold, leased, hired or performed by one person from those of another. If you want to protect that mark against infringement you must register it in accordance with the provisions of the Trade Marks Act. The trade mark that would distinguish one line of wares or services from another may be a picture, a label, a package, a container, the shape of the article or simply a word or series of words. Since the use of words is the most common method of distinguishing one item or service from another, words registered as trade marks are often referred to somewhat loosely as "trade names" or "brand names". However, a trade name generally means the name under which a business is carried on. Because of the possibility of confusion, the safe and accepted legal term is simply "trade mark".

Do You Have to Register Your Trade Mark?

No, you do not have to register your trade mark with the Federal Trade Marks Office but if someone else uses the same or a confusingly similar trade mark you will not be able to sue for infringement. You would, nevertheless, if not registered, have recourse against the infringer if you could prove that the defendant was attempting to pass off his goods or services as if they were yours. If your trade mark was registered, all you would have to do is prove that the same or similar mark was actually used and was confusing with yours.

Registration, furthermore, enables you to legally stop any act or activity that depreciates the goodwill value of your registration. The registered mark is also incontestable after five years. This means that if prior use of the trade mark was unknown to you at the time you obtained registration, the aggrieved party cannot obtain its cancellation once the five years period has elapsed.

What Trade Marks Are Registrable?

The general rule is that subject to certain exceptions you can register any trade mark that (a) has been in use or has been made known, (b) that is distinctive and (c) that will not be susceptible of confusion with other trade marks. This general rule, however, has many provisos because of the court's interpretation of the Trade Marks Act, and various International Trade Mark Conventions.

"Use" means to sell in normal trade in such a way that notice of the association of a trade mark with the wares is at that time given to the purchaser. Simply giving advance publicity does not constitute use. The sale of samples bearing the trade mark is not deemed to be use "in the normal course of trade" and is thus insufficient for registration purposes. A trade mark is not distinctive if used by more than one person unless, of course, the other person was properly licensed by the registered trade mark owner. Even if the mark was originally distinctive it may have lost distinctiveness prior to your application for registration if the name has fallen into the language and become essentially descriptive of the product.

Once Registered, Keep Your Trade Mark Alive

A registered trade mark lasts only as long as it is used but "using" has its own particular meaning in trade mark law. A trade mark must be used strictly as a trade mark. For example, be wary of how you use it in an advertising context. Remember that a trade mark is to distinguish your wares or services from those of another. If you use your mark in advertising as though it symbolised a class of merchandise you are not "using" your trade mark. Still worse, you might be inviting the public to apply a new meaning to what you thought was your own distinguishing trade mark so that it falls into the language and becomes essentially descriptive of the class of product. Once the latter position is reached your trade mark may no longer be registrable.

BEWARE:

THE SUBJECT OF TRADE MARKS IS A SPECIALIZED ONE. EXPERTS IN THIS FIELD ARE COMMONLY KNOWN AS TRADE MARK ATTORNEYS OR AGENTS. SEEK THEIR ADVICE BEFORE MAKING DECISIONS.

Technology can be a ma

Wouldn't it be great to have a map?

Finding ways to improve your products and processes through technology can be confusing. Don't face the maze alone.

CAN-MATE is linked to a worldwide information network. By gathering information, or by directing you to sources of expertise, we can help you solve technology problems and map out technology strategies. One phone call, and you have the information you need at your fingertips.

CAN-MATE is a private sector organization affiliated with the Canadian Manufacturers' Association (CMA), the National Research Council (NRC), and Industry, Science and Technology Canada (ISTC).

CAN-MATE offre ces services en français.
